THE METHOD

Your trip, your choices

A beautiful photo cannot tell you whether a room will work for you or an evening will suit your group. This guide helps you choose a place for a clear reason, then check the conditions before booking.

The selection is a documented starting point, not a best-of ranking. We have not field-tested these venues and present no partnership here. Links lead to sources; CENIV does not make reservations.

Use the criteria, shortlist two options and complete the worksheets. Leave one evening open: not every moment needs a booking.

THE METHOD

Start with the pace

Before looking for names, choose three priorities: sleep well, share a meal, listen to music, dance or see a show. One evening need not meet every wish.

Decide what you want to avoid: a very late return, another journey, loud music or a non-refundable commitment. These limits make the shortlist easier.

In a group, ask each person for one wish and one limit. The person booking summarises the choice and gets agreement on the total before any payment.

Accommodation is both your starting point and your place to rest. Begin with actual access, the room offered and arrival conditions, then consider the decor.

Do not infer quietness or accessibility from a district or the word “riad”. Ask about the floor, stairs, noise exposure and the walk from the drop-off point. A specific address matters more than a vague promise of proximity.

If you expect late nights, confirm how to re-enter the property. An advertised reception or welcome does not replace instructions that work at your return time.
